The Gold Flunkies. There is a vulgar air about the demeanor of leading northern editors in what they have to say in denunciation of silver that would suggest that they are the carriagedrivers and footmen of the gold-worshippers. They are superserviceable in their allegiance to those whose livery they wear, and they put on great show of disdain towards simple honesty when it comes too near the shining retinue of the devout. Even the New York World calls the silver bill "the great swindle," notwithstanding

its Democratic authorship and the extensive favor the bill received from the Democratic party. We cannot account for the extreme severity of the denunciation that is heaped upon the proposition to remonetize silver save upon the supposition that it is inspired by an impulse of a servile nature. Silver was a legal tender in the land for a greater part of our national history. It is a good and very pure metal, suitable for money, and once remonetized will be as little liable to variation in value as gold itself. The attempt to deride this metal is futile; the exertion to exclude it from the position as a part of the basis of the paper medium of this country is adverse to the national interest and to the energy and prosperity of the people. To employ both silver and gold would give the country a greatly-inereased power and

The taunts and vulgar disparagement which are heaped upon silver-the people's money-are of a vulgar type, and are only worthy of "flunkies."

South American Trade.

Philadelphia, the city par excellence of railroad enterprise, has the credit for projecting an attractive scheme for developing the commerce of the Valley of the Amazon. The Philadelphia North American thus explains it :

"The plan is to construct a railroad on the shortest line feasible which will allow the Madeira, a tributary of the Amazon, to be employed and Bolivia reached through both streams, with the short railway required to supplement water communication. This specific purpose is one of so much prospective value to Brazil, bringing, as it would, the rich products of the Atlantic slope of the Andes-both Bolivian and Brazilian-into the market, and providing the same region with the essentials for industry, comfort, and welfare, that the aid of the Empire and the Republic can be safely anticipated in the undertaking. The and [assistance that can be given it. It would speedily place more numerous American steamboats on both rivers; plant steam saw-mills where the saw has never been heard; create towns in a wilderness. and industry out of idleness; and it would give this country a control of the develop- ity-beats Lipscomb (colored Radical). ment of central South America that could not be wrested from us. The enterprise is worthy of Philadelphia inception and the assistance of every city, for all would profit by it."

Philadelphia is, indeed, a city of an enterprise that has sometimes a trace of the heroic. Up to the time of the opening of the Erie canal that city had the advantage of New York. That canal, however, gave an impulse to the prosperity of New York that rapidly impaired the commercial consequence of Philadelphia. She lost nearly all of her foreign commerce, including the rich East India trade, which had filled her that there was no opposition until the day lap with golden treasure. All her fine London and Liverpool packets were driven from her port, and her imports dwindled away to the catalogue of small things.

But Philadelphia turned her attention to new sources of thrift. Every house almost within her limits became a manufactory of some sort of thing, and every square counted its many steam-engines. Money flewed in and population increased, and wealth and power were so multiplied that the industrious city triumphed over the adversity that had robbed her of so much, and over a combination of pecuniary misfortunes which at one time threatened her with almost hopeless poverty.

Her banishment from the sea of commerce seemed only to stimulate her energy in the prosecution of her enterprise in the internal commerce of the country, and she seized upon railroads with signal energy, and became, as we say, the city of railway enterprises.

We know not enough of this South American scheme to speak more particularly of it. But we have this to say concerning the commerce and development of the great South American continent: that it should command at this time the deep interest of the people of the United States. South America produces staples of the most important nature, since they are found in every civilized land, and in every house, until they have become indispensable. Our people have the advantage of other nations in intercourse with South America in many respects, and those advantages should not be lost.

Besides the products of gardens and fields-of tillage-South America is wonderfully rich in minerals. The United States should occupy the vantage ground in the commerce with that continent-should be the chief auxiliary in its development and improvement in comfort and wealth.

The white man is the ruler amongst the races, and is destined to occupy exclusively all of the most desirable parts of the globe. The time for this consummation, of course, is remotely in the future; but the rich products and rich minerals of South America should warn those who control the destinies of North America that it would be well for them to occupy no second place in their of Delegates, elected by 339 majority.
